

Every Day Is Memorial Day

May 23, 2012

(Written the Saturday and Sunday of Memorial Day weekend 2011, when I was my usual long-term unemployed due to only temporary service work available at that time.—GF, May 18, 2012)

This coming Monday is Memorial Day,
same as it is every year
at this time.
Whoop-de-doo!
But I'm laid off right now, same as I usually am
around Memorial Day,
so this is no special holiday for me.
No time for me to rest from work,
because I'm not working,
but wish I were.
For me,
every day is
Memorial Day,
a "holiday" that's not really a holiday, just another day of the same old-same-old,
nothing to do
and all day
to do it in.
No hot dogs
over the grill,
no outdoor barbecue
for me over
Memorial Day,
because I can't afford them
without a job.
Someone once said
of my time
unemployed,
"I wish I had your time for reading."
Little did he know that, while there's some time for

reading, perhaps,
there's also time
that necessarily must be taken to figure out just exactly how to pay the bills and scrounge for needed cash.
Time to just sit and wait to be called
back to work,
itching anxiously
for that e-mail or phone call saying that there
is work once again.
Senator Orrin Hatch
had the chutzpah
to say we
unemployed
don't want jobs,
all we want is
our unemployment
checks,
so that we can buy drugs and vacation in Acapulco.
Little, little indeed
does he know,
stupid ass!
Buy drugs,
take expensive
vacations?
Hell, I'm lucky
if I can afford to go out and have a beer!
Vacation, hell!
Do you call scrounging for work because you really need
better employment
some sort of vacation,
Senator Hatch,
you with your
gold-plated
seat in the

Senate,
where you
disgrace the
institution!
Well, Happy,
Happy, Happy
Memorial Day,
everyone!
(Yeah, I really mean it!)
But it's just another day
for me,
except that,
since the offices
and banks
are closed,
I have to wait till
the day after
Memorial Day
to get my unemployment
check—
just another
long, long wait superadded to too many long, long
waits already;
another
three-day
weekend where even the two-day
weekends
are just like
the weekdays, only usually without money
by the time
they roll around.
Memorial Day,
where we honor
the veterans who died for the Land of the Free.
Only it ain't
so free
when you're out of work.
Ah, but it does

no good to bitch
too much,
for life's a bitch
anyway.
So I'll live with it and wait for
another day,
a different day,
a real Memorial Day
for me, when there's not a holiday,
just a blessed day
when I actually have to get up early in the morning,
going eagerly
back to work
again.
